How they work with translation

Different companies have different needs. This is why there are many ways of working with translation. Oscar translation works with a wide range of very different companies. In our client cases you can gain insight into the solutions and services some of our clients have chosen and the reason for their choices.

What elements make up a good translation?

A translation should be so well executed that the reader believes he's reading the original text. Unfortunately, this is not always the case because translation tasks are often delegated to unqualified people.

Translation is a profession, one which requires a university education, expertise in the relevant field and intimate acquaintance with the source and target languages. A novice simply leafing through a bilingual dictionary will not achieve the optimal goal of an expertly phrased translation. Like-wise, someone claiming bilingualism, but who either lacks the subject expertise or who possesses only the colloquial rudiments of the pertinent languages, will not be capable of fulfilling the demands of successful translation.

What are our strong points?

We respond to the wishes of our clients in an individual manner and develop custom-made solutions. Our quality assurance satisfies the highest quality demands.

A component of this lies in defining the strict selection criteria for choosing the translators who will work on our clients' projects. We only work with native speakers who possess a university degree and expertise with the material to be translated. Every translation is reviewed by an experienced proof-reader. With extensive projects, such as translations of manuals, we employ translation tools like Workbench which guarantee a consistent terminology throughout. Usage of CAT tools permits quicker and more economical updates of manuals.
